Theories of Motivation

Maslow's Hierarchy of Need Theory.

- Psychological theory proposed by Abraham Maslow in 1943. Motivation theory which states that five categories of human needs dictate an individual behavior.
- These five categories of humans needs are:
 - i. Physiological Need.
 - ii. Safety Need
 - iii. Social or Belongingness Need
 - iv. Esteem Need
 - v. Self Actualization

Explanation of Maslow's Hierarchy of Need Theory in Human Behavior Perspective

- i. Survival Need: Each employee need proper light, heat/air conditioning, phone, internet, computer, table and chair to perform his/her job.
- ii. Security Need: Safe place to work is important for employee. Job security, safe work environment help to motivate the employee.
- iii. Social Need: Cutting someone from group or Isolation is a punishment. Provide opportunity to employee to be a part of team.
- iv. Esteem Need: Related to pride and self-worth. Everyone want to be as a person of value. If possible provide employee with office car etc.
- v. Self Actualization: Related to self realization and self growth. Individual must be given opportunity to go as far as their ability will take them.

Herzberg's Two-Factors Theory

- Fredrick Herzberg extend Maslow work by using empirical research (experience or judgmental base) to develop his theory on employee motivation.
- i. He found that people were motivated by recognition, responsibility, achievement, advancement and work itself. These factors were labeled “Motivators”.
- ii. He found that bad feeling associated with low salary, minimal fringe benefits, poor working conditions, ill defined organization policies and close minded supervision. These factors were labeled as “Dissatisfier”.

McClelland's Three-Need Theory

- According to this theory, there are three acquired (developed) needs what are major motivators in work.
- i. Need for Achievement: Desire to do something better or more efficiently than it's been done before. Set the standards.
- ii. Need of Power: A need to make others behave in a way that they would not have behaved otherwise.
- iii. Need of Affiliation: Desire for friendly and close relationship.

Theory X and Theory Y

- Douglas McGregor proposed two distinct views of human being one negative , labeled Theory X and the other positive labeled Theory Y.
- i. Theory X: The assumption that employees who dislike work, are lazy, have lack of responsibility and must be directed and persuade to work.
- ii. Theory Y: The assumptions that employees like work, are creative, seek responsibility and can exercise self-direction.

Contemporary Theories of Motivation

Goal-Setting Theory

- Goal-setting theory says that specific goals increase performance of employee and that difficult goals when accepted, result in higher performance than do easy goals.
- Working towards goals is a major source of motivation. Employee must set specific goals which motivate them to perform or higher management provide goals opportunities to their employees.

Reinforcement Theory

- Reinforcement is a process of encouraging someone.
- This theory explains that the behavior is a function of its consequences.
- This theory purports that you can change someone's behavior by using reinforcement and punishment. Reward can be used to reinforce the behavior you want and punishment can be used to prevent the behavior.
- This theory ignores factors such as goals, expectation and needs.

Equity Theory of Motivation

- Adam's Equity Theory, also known as the Equity Theory of Motivation, was developed in 1963 by John Stacey Adams, a workplace behavioral psychologist.
- Equity Theory is based on the idea that individuals are motivated by fairness (عدل). In simple terms, equity theory states that if an individual identifies an inequity between themselves and a peer, they will adjust the work they do to make the situation fair in their eyes.
- As an example of equity theory, if an employee learns that a peer doing exactly the same job as them is earning more money, then they may choose to do less work, thus creating fairness in their eyes.
- Adam's Equity Theory tells us that the higher an individual's perception of equity (fairness), then the more motivated they will be. Conversely, an individual will be demotivated if they perceive unfairness.
